FEDS BUYING ENOUGH BULLETS FOR '24-YEAR WAR'

Radio host warns DHS preparing for prolonged crisis in U.S.

Federal, non-military agencies, noted radio host Brian Levin last week, have purchased enough ammunition recently to not only shoot every American five times but also engage in a prolonged domestic war.

The numbers are based on recent reports that put the last federal ammunition buy in the last 15 months at approaching half billion rounds.

"To provide some perspective," Levin noted, "experts estimate that at the peak of the Iraq war American troops were firing around 5.5 million rounds per month. At that rate, the [Department of Homeland Security] is stocked now for a 24-year war or a 24-year Iraq war."

What do federal agencies need with all that ammunition?

The government's only official explanation for the massive ammo buy is that law enforcement agents in the respective agencies need the bullets for "mandatory quarterly firearms qualifications and other training sessions."
